

This guide is just a rule of thumb to maximize the cooperativeness of people when leading, persuading, and getting them to take actions that you want them to take. You can and should understand how to get a D to get into rapport with you, or make a C express their emotions. Treat these as guidelines to make things easier for you, but do not neglect advanced skills of forcing compliance out of types to get them to do things they are naturally uncomfortable doing. By being able to get that kind of investment out of them you enter a higher realm of sales skills, but these principles can be used as fundamentals to fall back upon, or as a base to build upon to gain the more advanced skills.

Test With Rapport:

There's a spectrum of those giving and taking that determines a temperament of each. And that spectrum each contains positive and negative qualities. There is no pure type for the most part people are combinations but some aspects weigh more heavily than others.

D - Can be curt, 1 word answers may be rude, and cut you off to get straight to things. Look for one word responses and things of that nature.

I - Will jump right into the rapport with you and enjoy it immensely in a more higher energy way, going on long rants and you'll almost be forced to get things back on track

S - Will build rapport is more chill and warm and normal, they won't be as over the top as I's but they'll be okay with building some rapport with you naturally without you having to force it

C - Won't come off rude like a D, won't act over the top ready to dive into rapport like an I, and they'll be reluctant to do rapport unlike and S who'll accommodate. They have a lot of questions for you and want to dive into details, so they won't be rude and cut you off or try to control the conversation aggressively like a D will, but the rapport won't come out free flowing they won't give you a lot to work with when it comes to the conversation initially.

Related Understandings:

Directness - di

Come on strong take the initiative and create a powerful first impression,

Indirect - sc

More quite and reserved more easygoing or at least more self contained, ask more questions that give their opinions, the mistake might create negative self talk for days. They can act like a stubborn rock when they don't want to crack.

Open types - is open duh, focuses on feelings or states

Guarded Types - dc
they prefer working with things or through people rather than with or for them, focuses on points, like to know where a conversation is going - idle chitchat is not for them

Directness - di

Come on strong take the initiative and create a powerful first impression,

Indirect - sc

More quite and reserved more easygoing or at least more self contained, ask more questions that give their opinions, the mistake might create negative self talk for days. They can act like a stubborn rock when they don't want to crack.

Open types - is
open duh, focuses on feelings or states

Guarded Types - dc
they prefer working with things or through people rather than with or for them, focuses on points, like to know where a conversation is going - idle chitchat is not for them

Adaptability:

Higher Flexibility Personal Attitudes:

Confidence: Belief In ones Self, Trusting your own Judgement and Resourcefulness,

Tolerance: Open Minded State of Acceptance, willingness to defer judgement on the basis of limited time or information

Empathy: Sensitivity to another's point of view, caring approach towards others without being overwhelmed or manipulated by people.

Positiveness: Maintaining a state of positive expectations about people and situations. Including a positive state of energy in your thoughts and emotional patterns.

Respect for others: Desire to understand, accept, and consider mutual and separate interests, Choices, and commitments,

Lower Flexibility Personal Attitudes:

Rigidity, competition with others, discontent, being unapproachable, difficulty with dealing with ambiguity

Versatility:Mental And Emotional Aptitudes:

Resilience: Learning how to cope in spite of setbacks, barriers or limited resources

Vision, Foresight, creativity & imagination,

Attentiveness: Being mindful and aware of stimuli in the environment, reality focused

Competence: Capability of managing required tasks and being knowledgeable about required subjects and people, including uses and updates of appropriate abilities, self correction, able to initiate and evaluate by ones self, seeking feedback as appropriate, characterized by a problem solving mindset/approach to matters

Lower versatility attitudes:

Subjectiveness, bluntness, resistance, single mindedness, unreasonable risk taking,

Flexibility:

Higher Flexibility attitudes indicate: A higher level of security and sense of personal worth or wellbeing, an open minded searching attitude in dealing with people and situations. Positive expectations about your own goals and desired results, and those of others.

Lower Flexibility attitudes indicate:

A tendency to be reactive to people, conditions, or events. Often responding out of fear or anxiety. Predetermined views, conclusions, or patterns of behavior which are non negotiable. A tendency to be negative about what may occur. Especially if points of view or opinions change.

The best Leadership Style: Remember that there is no such thing as one best all purpose leadership style. Instead the best leaders are those that realize what a job role or specific situation requires for successful performance, and then ensures those outcomes. At times this may involve a clear cut match between your own strengths and the required actions. At other times behavior requirements may vary. The effect leader may adapt his own natural style by using new behavior methods he has learned or may call upon other qualified individuals who's talents and energies can more productively handle the immediate problem. Or a good leader will take action to modify the environment. This could include shifting the work priorities to ensure the successful completion of the necessary tasks without sacrificing the wellbeing of other people.dd

DOMINANCE

Priorities: getting immediate results, taking action, challenging self and others

Motivated by: power and authority, competition, winning, success, internally: the win

Fears: loss of control, being taken advantage of, vulnerability

You will notice: self-confidence, directness, forcefulness, risk-taking

Limitations: lack of concern for others, impatience, insensitivity

Temperament: Active, Fast-paced, Assertive, Dynamic, Bold

Action Plan:

So you concerned with being number one, show them how to win, new opportunities, think logically, display reasoning, wants facts and highlights, provide concise data, strive for results, agree on goal and boundaries then support or get out of their way, likes personal choices, allow them to do their thing within limits, likes changes, very routines, prefers to delegate, looks for opportunities to modify their workload focus, wants others to notice and compliment them on accomplishments they have done, needs to be in charge, let them take the lead when appropriate - but give them parameters, tendency towards conflict, if necessary argue with conviction on points of disagreement backed up with facts, don't argue on personality basis,

Get right to the point, and decisively without getting bogged down in minute details, operate with conviction, know what you're doing, and don't try to bluff. You're not cowering to them, you're asserting yourself upon them which they want. Take opportunities during natural transition periods to build rapport, like if you have to pull up some paperwork, or if in person when you're walking outside to check something out, or when you're pulling something up to process payments, don't do too much just show a bit of friendliness during those periods and when you're transitioned into the next activity get right back into things. If they are reading or getting or doing something it's okay to have the silence there to allow them to focus on getting the thing done they're trying to finish, like if they're filling out a form or something - don't randomly feel a need to fill the silence. Keeping a focus like this they'll naturally start wanting to build rapport with you as the process deepens and they do business with you.

Behavior Pattern: Direct/Guarded

Pace: Faster/decisive

Priority: The Task/Results

Gain Security Through: Control, leadership

Measures Personal Worth By: Quality or results, impact of results, track record

Appearance: Businesslike, Functional

Seeks: Control

Strength: Administration, Leadership, Pioneering

Weaknesses/Growth Areas: Impatient, insensitive to others, poor listener

Irritations: inefficiency, indecision

Under Stress: Dictatorial, critical

Decision Making Pattern: decisive

Occupation: Executive, military leader, newspaper editor

Leadership Of them: Agree on the goal and specify the boundaries of the playing field, then get out of their way. Ignore/be tolerant of their natural competitive spirit, and focus the energy on a common goal for bettering the organization or situation. They seek this sort of encouragement and feedback to function most effectively within the general framework of shared expectations.

Coaching them: They like to learn the basic steps to quickly sift out what they want. In the interest of saving time they try to find shortcuts, so show them the simplest fastest route to get them to their stated destination. They don't bother with details it feels like wasting time they focus on results. Focus on the high points. Only the details to get something to work so they can move on to the next thing.

They want to manage you, let them take the reigns and feel empowered on certain things clearly.

Getting them to Decide: They tend to make autonomous no nonsense decisions. If the decision will help them meet their goals they go for it, if not they typically say no. One of the few times they'll procrastinate in reaching a conclusion is when it'll take too much time or effort to do the homework to determine the best alternative. You can prevent this procrastination by simply providing a brief analysis for each option you present to them.

Motivating them: Provide them with options and clearly describe the probabilities of success in achieving goals "Ross, here are 4 possibilities for developing the Evans estate. I've highlighted the key points for each suggestion and included costs for each projection on the bottom of each one. The choice is yours." They gravitate to situations where they can take charge and win. On tennis courts they're arguing with refs. They gravitate to the leadership positions. It's not how you play the game it's winning more than anything else that motivates them.

Complimenting them: Mention their achievements, upward mobility, and leadership potential, omit personal comments and focus on their track record. "Jones, you've exceeded our company goals every quarter for the last year. And have put in more hours than anybody but the top officials here. The CEO has his eye on you for the next upcoming vice presidential slot."

Counseling Them: Stick to the facts, draw them out by talking about the desired results then discuss their concerns, focus on tasks more than feelings, ask them how they would solve the problem, "Anne, we've heard a few comments that need to be addressed. We've heard some of our employees don't feel appreciated for the extra hours they've been putting in for you on the Evan's project. They say they've given up social engagements and work 14 hour days to meet their deadline. How do you think we can bolster their morale?"

Correcting Them: Describe what results are desired, show them the gap between actual and desired, suggest clearly the improvement that is needed, and establish a time when they will get back to you. "We need to streamline communication around here so that one hand know what the other hand is doing. Last month we had two separate divisions calling on the same corporate CEO for donations. I want you to come up with a plan so that we know what who's working on so that we don't duplicate our efforts. Get back to me by the end of the week."

Communicating With Them: Be prepared to listen to their suggestions, the course of action they have in mind and the general results they are considering. This enables you to begin on a positive note by indicating the areas in which you already agree. Then you can work backwards towards gaining agreement on the results you both want, and are willing to either mutually or independently allow the other to achieve. "Sarah, this format will give you the freedom to develop your branch your way and still allow Vern and Ellen to structure their's another way. Without sacrificing time or morale."

Making decisions and problem solving with them: They'll want to provide their own initial view on the decision to be made or problem to be solved and the process they'd prefer to follow in reaching a clear cut preferably quickly chosen solution. "As I see it, you have the most experience in organizing seminars like this Charles. So why don't you throw out a few ideas? You can anticipate where possible and be open to summarizing the achievements you've made." Or, possibly in a case like where you have a lack of achievement in this area. "Hal you flatter me, but I've never undertaken and international convention like this before. As for ideas, why don't we decide who wants to perform which function and then we can all do what we feel comfortable doing. With this approach you'r most likely to reach mutual agreement with the least hassle for everyone concerned, yourself included."

When suggesting a different idea, opinion, or action to them: Be sure to point out you are trying to work in ways that are acceptable to them and also yourself. Focus on your desire to identify solutions that will also meet their expectations. Stress that you don't want to cause difficulties for either them or you. "Phil, instead of writing this report as it occurs to you, and me... I'd rather write an outline first and then the rapport. I know it takes longer initially, but it saves time in the long run because the writing will be better organized and make more sense to the readers."

When Acknowledging them, when it's appropriate to reward or reinforce their behaviors: focus on how pleased you are, assume they are also pleased with the desired outcome in that situation. Also mention how glad you are to be a part of that process working with them to make things better for both of you through cooperation. Bottom line each of you gets better results by combining your energies on a common targeted goal. "Phil, this rapport turned out much better with your wonderful anecdotes and asides. Now we have something that's interesting, clear, and well organized."

Delegating to them: Give them the bottom line and then let them do their thing so that they can be more efficient, give them parameters guidelines, and deadlines. “We need to get that mall built a month sooner or we’ll lose our shirts. 14 tenants are threatening to bail out of their contracts if we don’t open in time for the holidays. Don’t spend more than another $30k keep everything legal and out of the newspapers and get back to me by Monday morning.”

INFLUENCE

Priorities: expressing enthusiasm, taking action, encouraging collaboration

Motivated by: social recognition, group activities, friendly relationships, internally: the show of things

Fears: social rejection, disapproval, loss of influence, being ignored

You will notice: charm, enthusiasm, sociability, optimism, talkativeness

Limitations: impulsiveness, disorganization, lack of follow-through

Temperament: Accepting, People-focused, Empathizing, Receptive, Agreeable

Action Plan:

So you concerned with approval and appearances, show them that you admire and like them, seek enthusiastic people and situations, behave optimistically and provide an upbeat setting, think emotionally, support their feelings, want to know general expectations, avoid involved details, focus on the big picture, need involvement and people contact, interact and participate with them, like changes and innovations, vary the routine, avoid repetition, want others to notice them, complement them personally and often, often need help getting organized, do it together, look for action and stimulation, keep up a fast lively pace, want feedback that they look good, mention their accomplishments progress and your other genuine appreciation,

Help them learn to: Prioritize and organize. See tasks through to completion, view people and tasks more objectively, avoid overuse of giving and taking advice which can result in lack of focus on task. Write things down.

Show your energy and liveliness while focusing on the give and take interaction, make your encounter fun, upbeat and enjoyable

When you are the I - attend to key details when appropriate improve your follow through efforts, monitor socializing to keep it in balance with other aspects of life, write things down and work from a list so you know what to do and when. Prioritize activities and focus on tasks in order of importance. Become more organized and orderly in the way you do things. Get the less appealing tasks of the day over with. Pay more attention to time management of activities, check to make sure you're on course with known tasks or goals.

Behavior Pattern: Direct/Open

Pace: Faster/spontaneous

Priority: The Relationship/Interaction

Gain Security Through: Playfulness, other's approval

Measures Personal Worth By: acknowledgement, applause, compliments

Appearance: Fashionable, Stylish

Seeks: Recognition

Strength: Persuading, Enthusiastic, Entertaining

Weaknesses/Growth Areas: Inattentive to Detail, short begin attention span, low follow through

Irritations: routines, complexity

Under Stress: Sarcastic, superficial

Decision Making Pattern: spontaneous

Occupation: Sales, public relations, actor

Leadership Of them: Help them focus their abilities, with their energy and enthusiasm they might get involved a bunch of stuff and either accomplish a lot or show flurries of activity while getting nothing done in a significant way. Channel it with tactful reminders and hands on assistance to help them prioritize and organize. They'll let you know when they feel off or having off days and you can give them verbal boosts and personalized attention.

Coaching them: Don't give them too much or they can become overwhelmed. Skip as much of the detailed boring stuff as possible. Get them involved. They're typically kinesthetic hands on learners so let them try by first getting a feel for what's involved, and then showing you what they understood so you can give them structured feedback. Frequently they want to jump in and try before they're ready. Or before they fully understand everything. Allow them to save face when they do something wrong, and heap on compliments when they get it right.

Prioritizing with them: Many find that sorting out priorities and solutions becomes very difficult when too many opportunities bombard them. When this happens they may become characteristically mute and immobilized. Temporarily. Other people can help by prioritizing items for them to tackle. When other people organize task for them their anxiety level lessens even though they don't like organization.

Getting them to Decide: Support their dreams: They operate from a predominantly multi focus right brain perspective. They see mental picture first then convert those pictures to words. Preferring main ideas and generalities not details they base decisions on their impulses gut feelings and other's recommendations and testimonials. Emotions rule. It's not they don't use logic or facts, but feelings and emotion comes first. Thinking is a servant to their feeling state. Be more enthusiastic show you're interested in them by letting them talk, by using more animation in your own gestures and voice, and illustrate your ideas using stories or mental pictures that relate to him and his goals. They like to interact to try to to hurry the discussion. Include opportunities for small talk and getting personally acquainted. They like to envision the big picture to generally less motivated by many facts and details they respond better to short overviews or capsule summaries of what you plan to cover. Attempt to develop some stimulating enjoyable ideas together while focusing on supporting their opinions and dreams. They turn off to people who douse their dreams. Then support their ideas by showing them how they can turn their talk into action. If you disagree try not to argue because they dislike conflict. You might not win the argument anyway because their strong suit is feelings and intuition. If trapped the can twist people around through very clever manipulation of feelings with their usage of words and emotions. Try to explore alternate solutions instead. When you reach an agreement iron out the specific details concerning what when, who, where, how. Then document the agreement with them since they tend to naturally forget such details.

Motivating them: They like special packages and a little something extra to inspire them to go the whole 9 yards. (If you do x I'll give you y!) Or, show them how they can look good in the eyes of others. (When you close your next order that'll be you're 10th order this year, you can all but clinch that presidents award for achievement this year at the annual rewards ceremony! The big boss himself will see that!) Contests and rewards work, but with them they may sprint towards a quick win the first week or so and then they'll tell themselves they have a whole year to win a contest if it's something too far away and they they take their foot off the gas and get sidetracked by other things and do nothing about it until the week before the contest ends and then try to sprint to the finish within the last week or so. To keep up their motivation give them shorter contests with smaller pay-offs culminating in the big win at the end.

Counseling Them: Give them ample opportunity to talk about whatever may be bothering them. Pay attention to both facts, and feelings - but put your primary emphasis on their feelings. Ask probing questions and involve them by asking how they can solve the challenge or difficulty. Sometimes just airing their feelings and thoughts relieves tension for these individuals. Talking allows them to get something off of their chest, and even can become and end in itself because their energy is largely influenced by the quality of their relationship with a person.

Correcting Them: When stress hits them they prefer looking the other way and searching for more positive upbeat experiences. They avoid problems as long as they can. If the pressure persists they tend to literally walk away from the problem. When this tactic fails they may become emotionally candid in attempts to meet their needs. (I can't believe I let this happen, but I brought it all upon myself) Sometimes stress manifests itself in animated panic. Let these individuals know specifically what the challenge happens to be. Define the behavior that can eliminate it & confirm the mutually agreeable action plan in writing to prevent future misunderstandings. Since they prefer keeping the conversation light avoid what they view as negative or distasteful approaches. Rather than (why did your sales drop off 50% last month?) Use more optimistically stated questions like (How'd you like to bolster your sales up to your normal range and beyond it?) They'd simply rather deal with things going right.

Communicating With Them: Be prepared to listen to their personal feelings and experiences. Since they have a need to be both expressive and able to share their emotions with others. Their style requires open and responsive interaction with others preferable in a manner of congenial and unhurried conversation. It's much like that between long time friends. (Just between me and you... I feel very uneasy about x)

Making decisions and problem solving with them: They'll want to avoid a discussion of more complex negative sounding or otherwise messy problem situations. It's difficult for them to feel positive or agreeable with you or anyone else under these circumstances. In making decisions with them they will be open to your suggestions as long as these ideas will allow them to look and feel good and not require a lot of follow up detail work or long term commitment. (You know just about everybody who's anybody...since we need to get x by date, why not go ahead and wrap up all your calls by date? - then you can relax a lot more next week)

When suggesting a different idea, opinion, or action to them: Be sure to point out you are doing it that way if it's acceptable to them. Focus on their desire to identify solutions that will also meet their expectations. Stress that you don't want to cause difficulties for either them or you, above all offer your suggestions as gifts that can make this situation, tasks, or relationship easier and more beneficial to them as well as to other people who you feel are also likely to find this very acceptable and desirable. (You're lucky I'm on the nominating committee. So many people wanted the hospitality position that I couldn't manage it for you this year, but I think I got one that's even better than that. How about Junior high dances?)

Complimenting them: Pay direct personal compliments to them as individuals when legitimately deserved. Mention their charm friendliness, creative ideas, persuasiveness and/or appearance. Better yet, all of the above. While other types respond to more specific job related comments they can mentally relive more global generalizations for weeks to come. (We are so lucky to have you with us, you're a real gem.)

When Acknowledging them, and when it's appropriate to reward or reinforce their behaviors: Focus on how glad you are they have succeeded in finding a pleasant solution to their concern or objective. In addition let them know how much you appreciate them for their openness and willingness to be responsive to you in a way that allows everyone to end up feeling good about the results afterwards. (George, I'm so glad we could reach a solution that both you and I feel good about. I appreciate your openness about only being able to call perspective donors on Friday night. That's fine with me, we'll work this out so that everyone is happy.)

Delegating to them: Make sure to receive clear agreement. Set up checkpoints/times to avoid long stretches with no progress reports. Otherwise they'll lapse into their natural way of doing things. Spontaneously completing particulars which feel best while postponing less stimulating tasks especially those that involve follow up and checking.

They're good for maintaining group morale and brainstorming. Get their opinions and assistance and present to them activities that draw attention and recognition to themselves appeals to them.

Concept people who come up with plenty of ideas but not the means of carrying them out. So steer them into ways that assure the implementation of those ideas.

Structure tasks to fit the natural work style of that person.

STEADINESS

Priorities: giving support, maintaining stability, enjoying collaboration

Motivated by: stable environments, sincere appreciation, cooperation, opportunities to help, internally: the participation

Fears: loss of stability, change, loss of harmony, offending others,

You will notice: patience, team player, calm approach, good listener, humility

Limitations: overly accommodating, tendency to avoid change, indecisiveness

Temperament: Feels like an everyday person. Easy going calm slower outlook. Like an old lady from those old sitcoms giving out calm good energy to everyone in her family and neighbors. Patient, modest, accommodating, neighborly.

Action Plan:

So you concerned with stability, show how your idea minimizes risk, think logically, show your reasoning, want documentation, provide facts and proof, like personal involvement, demonstrate your interest in them, need to know step by step sequence, provide outline or detailed instruction as you personally walk them through, wants others to know their patient perseverance, compliment them for their steady follow through, avoid risks and changes, give them personal assurances, dislike conflict, act non aggressively, accommodate others, allow them to provide service and support for others, look for calmness and peace, provide a relaxing friendly atmosphere, enjoy teamwork, provide them with a cooperative group/team, want sincere feedback that they're appreciated, acknowledge their easygoing manner and helpful efforts,

Cultivate a casual easy going personable 1o1 relationship, treat them with warmth and sensitivity

When you Are the steady: Stretch by taking on a bit more or different duties beyond your comfort level, increase verbalization of your thoughts and feelings, speed up your actions by getting into some projects more quickly, desensitize yourself somewhat so that you aren't negatively affected by your colleagues feelings to the point of affecting your own performance. Learn to adapt more quickly to either changes or refinements to existing practices. Bolster your assertiveness techniques,

With others: Help them. Utilize shortcuts and discard unnecessary steps, track their growth. Avoid doing things the same way, focus on the goal without attending to other thoughts or feelings, realize that there is more than one approach to tasks, become more open to some risks and changes. To feel sincerely appreciated, speak up and voice their thoughts and feelings. Modify the tendency to do what others tell them, get and accept credit and praise when appropriate.

Behavior Pattern: Indirect/Open

Pace: Slower/relaxed

Priority: The Relationship/Communication

Gain Security Through: Friendship, Cooperation

Measures Personal Worth By: Compatibility with others, depth of contribution

Appearance: Casual, Conforming

Seeks: Acceptance

Strength: Listening, Teamwork, Follow Through

Weaknesses/Growth Areas: Oversensitive, slow to action, lacks global perspective

Irritations: insensitivity, impatience

Under Stress: Submissive, indecisive

Decision Making Pattern: Conferring

Occupation: Family Doctor, social services, teacher

Leadership Of them: Encourage them to update their methods, they contribute stability and perseverance to their workplace, since they work towards harmony within the office they usually fit comfortably within the work environment, but they may become used to using the same old methods again and again, sometimes their procedures may include steps that were needed when they learned the procedure, but can now be discarded, they may improve their work practices by utilizing shortcuts that eliminate extra steps.

Coaching/developing them: When they're in training for a job or something they prefer one on one hands on instruction with a real live human being starting at the beginning and ending at the end. By learning each step they become generally more comfortable with their functions, during training and other newer situations they tend to observe others for a longer than average time. When they feel they can do a task then and only then will they comfortably begin. This slower pace can frustrate dominant and influencers, both of whom like to plunge right into things whether they've done them before or not. Understand that they need to do things slowly and this will re-assure the faster paced types that the job will get done. Get ready to be ready with them. Have a step by step list of procedures or a working timetable/schedule at your disposal. They need to feel secure in their mastery of procedures until their actions become second nature and more routine. At the same time, they prefer a pleasant and patient approach while they learn what's expected of them.

Motivating them: Besides thinking they can learn to master a series of procedures they like to also feel that their relationship with others can benefit from their follow through. (If you can learn to use this computer by next week, you can send the whole Christmas mailing for Mr. Hawkins on Monday - then he can go to Texas for his family reunion) Or show them how to strengthen their relationships with others. (When this office makes its 1000th sale, it can win the outstanding division award for the year, and you can help that happen by getting Mr. Aaron to look at this new demographic data.) Focus on what's important now. Avoid procrastination and/or hoping others will do things for them. Practice and perfect

Counseling Them: Allow plenty of time to explore their thoughts and feelings so you can understand the emotional side of the situation. They usually express their feelings less directly so draw them out through questioning and listening responses. Bear in mind this type tends to balk at sudden change whether the change is good or bad. The key point is that their stability motivated state is disrupted by the unknown. You can help reduce their fears by showing how specific changes will benefit them and their company. (Barbra, moving to Dallas will be an adjustment, for all of us at first but 80% of our staff has agreed to go. The company will move you and your family, sell your house, add more medical and dental benefits to your health plan and give you a 10% bonus for loyal service. We like to take care, do the unpleasant as well as the fun things for our own, and you are a valuable trusted employee. And besides, you'll still be with many of the same friends coworkers and the company you've always been with day in and day out.)

Correcting Them: Reassure them that you only want to correct a specific behavior. They tend to take things personally, so remove the something is wrong with you barrier as quickly as possible. Don't blame or judge the person, keep the conversation focused on the behavior and its appropriateness. If the problem involves a procedure help them learn how to improve it. Point out in a non threatening way what they're already doing right while also emphasizing what needs changing. (Norma I admire your persistence on this proposal, but we have to add more details to the idea section before we send it out. For example...)

Communicating With Them: Be ready to do more talking than listening with them. They don't naturally feel comfortable when the limelight is focused on them. You'll want to clarify any key agenda item with them. Working to stay organized, and moving forward steadily but slowly as you check to make sure that they both, understand, and accept what is being said. (Did you want me to stick around the office at a particular time each day in case you need to telephone me in case of emergency questions on this account or do you want me to call you?)

Making decisions and problem solving with them: In dealing with problems and decisions with them make sure to deal with 1 subject or situation at a time, one step at a time. To gain clarity, before moving on to other items make sure they are ready willing and able to do so. Recalling that they need stability deal with matters calmly and in a more relaxed manner, encourage them to share their suggestions as to how the decision might be made in a way that is likely to add even more stability to the current conditions that already or previously exist. (Would you mind writing down a schedule of your offices activities so I can get my proposal written up without missing anything)

When suggesting a different idea, opinion, or action to them: Point out how you are trying to identify ways that you can help continue to make things pleasant for them. You simply have an idea or opinion in this respect which will also help stabilize your own relationship expectations with them, which is important to you too. (I know we initially agreed on 10 phone calls per day, but some of our volunteers are unable to make that commitment, would you be comfortable making 15 calls a day if those calls included your personal friends and family?)

Complimenting them: Mention their teamwork and dependability, (Pam besides plugging along on this project for two years I really appreciate the fact that you've encouraged everyone else to do their part, we couldn't have done it without you) or remark how others regard the, how well they get along with co-workers, and how important their relationship efforts have been to the company. (Name, you've been the glue holding this place together for the last 20 years.) Effusiveness can arouse their suspicions so stick to praising what they've done rather more abstract personal attributes. Otherwise their modesty and your vagueness may cause them to dismiss your comments.

When Acknowledging them, and when it's appropriate to reward or reinforce their behaviors: Focus on how you genuinely and sincerely appreciate their willingness to make things good for you and others. Approach matters in a more systematic low keyed and understandable manner Also, point out how you've noticed they make important contributions when they take the initiative to share their own ideas interests and insights in helping make sure that these results are achieved. (Just say anything about the impending merger that you want to share. We certainly don't want to use any high pressure tactics which is precisely why you meet our own expectations so well. Thank you very much for your willingness to provide us with this valuable input)

Delegating to them: They may be reluctant to ask others to do their own share of the work. So you can make a personal appeal to their loyalty and sense of sportsmanship (Al, you're an example for this company of genuine cooperative spirit. Your staff wants to please you so by giving everyone in your department just 10 of those names to call, you can all reach the goal together by noon tomorrow. Otherwise, you'll probably have a lot more difficulty reaching all of those people by the target date.) Give them the task, state the deadlines that need to be met, and explain why it's important to do it that way. (I'll need 500 copies of these summaries typed and collated by 5pm today, Mr. Jeffries is getting back from New York 2 days early and he wants them by tomorrow morning)

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS

Priorities: ensuring accuracy, maintaining stability, challenging assumptions

Motivated by: opportunities to use expertise or gain knowledge, attention to quality, internally: the process

Fears: criticism, slipshod methods, being wrong, illogical acts, emotionality and irrationality in others

You will notice: precision, analysis, skepticism, reserve, quiet

Limitations: overly critical, tendency to overanalyze, isolate self

Temperament: Thoughtful, Moderate-paced, Calm, Methodical, Careful, Tries to control their emotions, follow through, organization, Questioning, Logic-focused, Objective, Skeptical, Challenging

Action Plan:

So you concerned with aggressive approaches, approach them in an indirect non threatening way, think logically, show your reasoning, seek data, give it to them in writing, need to know the process, prove explanations and rational, utilize caution, allow them to think, inquire and check before making decisions, prefer to do things themselves than delegating, let them check on other's progress and performance, wants others to know their accuracy, compliment them on their thoroughness, avoid conflict, tactfully ask for clarification and assistance you may need, need to be right, allow them time to find the best or correct answer, like to contemplate, tell them why and how,

Use an orderly logical accurate approach which zeros in on the process and procedures. Give them well thought out accurate documentation.

If you're the C: Modify criticism whether spoken or unspoken of other's work. Check less often, or only check the critical things as opposed to everything allowing the flow of the process to continue. Ease up on controlling emotions. Engage in more water cooler interactions. Accept the fact that you can have high standards without expecting perfection. Occasionally confront a colleague or boss with whom you disagree. Instead of avoiding or ignoring them and doing what you want to do anyway. Tone down the tendency to over prepare.

When Dealing with C's: Gently remind them to - share their knowledge and expertise with others, stand up for themselves with the people they prefer to avoid, shoot for realistic deadlines and parameters, view people and tasks less seriously and critically, balance their lives with both interactions and tasks, keep on course with tasks with less checking, maintain high expectations with high priority items not necessarily everything.

Behavior Pattern: Indirect/Guarded

Pace: Slower/Systematic

Priority: The Task/Process

Gain Security Through: Preparation, thoroughness

Measures Personal Worth By: Precision, accuracy

Appearance: Formal, Conservative

Seeks: Accuracy

Strength: Planning, Systematizing, Orchestration

Weaknesses/Growth Areas: Perfectionist, critical, unresponsive

Irritations: disorganization, impropriety

Under Stress: Withdrawn, headstrong

Decision Making Pattern: deliberate

Occupation: Engineer, researcher, artist

Leadership Of them: Help them substitute quality for perfection. Since they're characterized by the most complex thinking pattern they base their decisions on proven information and track records. They want to make rational choices based on facts, not on other people's opinions or testimonials unless those people are conscientious thinker's personal heroes. Even then, they'll probably want to see it in writing. When they say they need to think about it, they usually mean it.

Help Them Make a Decision: Supply the materials they request, and allow them the time to make the right decision for themselves. Focus on emphasizing deadlines and parameters so they can build those timeframes into their procedures.

Coaching/developing them: Point out the most important things to remember first. Then demonstrate the procedure in an efficient logical manner, stressing the purpose of each step. Proceed at a relatively slow pace. Stopping at each key place in the process to check for his or her understanding. Ask for possible input, especially regarding desired refinements that may be appropriate. This approach ensures success with the task and minimization of stress for them.

Motivating them: Appeal to their need for accuracy and logic. They don't respond well to fancy verbal antics so keep your approach clear, clean, and documentable. Better yet, provide illustration in documentation. Avoid exaggeration and vagueness. Show them how this is the best available current option. (Mrs. Alberts, our office cleaning service should meet all your cleanliness needs. I think that a neat and sanitary environment is a key standard for more productivity. Do you agree or see it differently?) If they decide to take part in a competitive situation they'll probably do it as they do other tasks, bit by bit, until they do it right. Unlike their colleagues who may show enthusiasm at the beginning, they often show the patience and follow through to ultimately win. If they perceive the contest as worthwhile and don't become too pre-occupied with details along the way. Whereas some people focus on winning shorter term battles, they are motivated by the ultimate sense of lasting personal glory derived from triumphing in the overall war.

Counseling Them: Illicit their thoughts about processes procedures or problems. Like asking something like (If it were in your power, how would you change this to make it even better?) Like steady relaters they often express their thoughts and opinions indirectly. So persist in your attempts to get them to talk. They dislike change because they typically view changes in the future as unknown variables where unforeseen mistakes might happen. They need to plan for change ahead of time so they can identify and bring under control any key considerations that have to be addressed in the process. When possible allow them to investigate possible repercussions, especially at the beginning stages. That way they'll know more about the future and may be more comfortable with possible changes.

Correcting Them: Show them the way to get a job done and they'll typically master the format. Then modify it to suit their individual needs. They tend to start with what they have to work with, then personalize it almost from the beginning so that it works better as they see it. So they may avoid people whom they perceive might tell them to do things differently. This is one way they maintain control of their work. They tend to sidestep authorities who they think are endeavoring to correct them. At the extreme this behavior can appear sneaky to other types. Especially if they get caught. Specify the exact behavior that is indicated and outline how you would like to see it changed. Establish agreed upon checkpoints and times. Allow them to save face, as they fear being wrong. (Nelson your work here is typically done neat, on time, and right on the money. Now that we're switching the office to computers, you'll be able to turn out the same quality of work, only faster. I'd like you to take this computer class.)

Communicating With Them: Be well organized and clear in your communications since they're likely to ask lots of questions about a situation or subject, in their search for a logical conclusion. You may want to have them clarify what their more pressing key concerns are. Ask your questions in a more discreet, non judgmental manner. To elicit the points, objectives, or assurances they want. (Lenny, I'm not trying to pressure you, but are you not interested in the auditors position, or in any position?)

Making decisions and problem solving with them: Set the stage by making sure they are open to discussing the problem or decision being considered at this time. If they aren't ready either set a definite time that's better for both of you or explore their concern in even pursuing this subject. When the situation is being explored review your entire impression of the process. (My understanding is this, you'd like to think it over for a week or so and figure out what kind of time commitment you'd be able to make to the group. When would I be able to call you about your decision?) Decide on a logical approach for gaining common agreement about both the nature of the problem or the decision involved, and the more reasonable way in finding how to resolve it. Do so in a way that is likely to be most satisfactory to them, you, and any other key individuals involved.

When suggesting a different idea, opinion, or action to them: Point out how you would like to be able to identify those ideas perspectives or actions likely to allow you, them, and/or others to reach a more perfected solution or situation. Stress how less difficulties or confusion are likely to result. Ask them what insights or suggestions they or individuals they know and value could bring to this situation. (Carrol if we leave at 10 friday morning and get to palm springs by 11, we can meet with Mr. Concle and his VP's for lunch about our ideas for organizing his grand opening party. Do you know any wholesalers we can contact there so we can come up with a realistic estimate for making their party a bonafide hit?)

Complimenting them: Mention their efficiency thought processes, organization, persistence, and accuracy. Don't mix personal and professional comments unless you know them very well. Even then they prefer more privately communicated plausible praise. (Jeffry, you were so thorough on this project, that we had every shred of information that we needed, and then some just in case we required a safety net. Thanks again for a good job.) Compliments don't mean much to them, they really don't think about them, but they do like genuine heartfelt appreciation once in a while like, "You did a fine job." Or "I've really benefited from your work, and so have others who have told me about your contributions." In other words... Keep praise simple and concise for them. What they think about some accomplishment is much more important to them. They are hard on themselves.

When Acknowledging them, and when it's appropriate to reward or reinforce their behaviors: Focus on your realization of how difficult it can be at times for them to reach the high standards they set for themselves. Also focus on how much you appreciate this personal characteristic for what it's done to make things better for you and your relationship with them. Cite a specific and appropriate example that proves this point. (Robert, your a very good chef, that salmon was cooked perfectly, juicy and flavorful without a hint of dryness. I don't want to embarrass you, but I feel obliged to share with you how truly impressed I am. Thank you for your efforts.) Then notice their reaction. If it's discomfort share with them that you did not mean to embarrass them, but just to let them know how much you value them. If their reaction is more positive, ask them to tell you more about the sense of satisfaction and enjoyment they derive some similar things. (I'll bet you like creating other recipes too. Is that correct?)

Delegating to them: Take time to answer their most critical questions about structure and or guidance in a specific situation. The more they understand the details, the more likely they'll be to complete the task properly. Be sure to establish deadlines. (Angela, the court date on the Mortermir case has been moved up to Monday, so we have to respond by speeding things up a bit. It will proceed almost as efficiently as if you researched everything by yourself if we enlist two associates to help you work under your direction on tasks you delegate to them and review.

Before getting started do you have any preferences on the who's or how to's of this process that you think are essential to check with me at this time.)

5 Stages of closing and customer service.

1. Making Contact - Establish Trust & enough value for them to want to hear more.
2. Study Needs - Find out what their needs are, but also look for ways to create opportunities - get prospects involved in this process through well structured questions, build cooperation and a foundation for shared commitment to a solution.
3. Propose solutions - A custom tailored presentation to the prospects needs that completes their certainty in the vehicle for their solution that you are proposing.
4. Getting commitment - logical conclusion to the communication that's been taking place. There shouldn't be objections, if resistance occurs it simply shows that there's a need to gather more information or details. Logistics/concerns around their time, money, or the effort they have to put in for the solution.
5. Assuring Satisfaction - Make sure they're good after the purchase.

Selling to D's

They want to know the bottom line, what this will do for me and when. Give them enough information to satisfy their need for overall performance. They don't need to spend time going through things bolt by bolt with a laundry list of testimonials and results, or getting too chummy with them.

1. Making contact - When you write or call them do it in a formal businesslike manner. Get right to the point, focus quickly on the task. Refer to bottom line results. Increased efficiency save time, return on investments, profits, etc. Tell them what's in it for them. Take care to be well organized, time conscious, efficient, and businesslike. At a slower pace they become especially wary as they'll question a person's competence. They don't want to make friends with you, they want to get something out of you if they think you have something to offer. And they're usually willing to pay for it. A salesperson just needs to provide sufficient information and enough incentive for them to meet with you. When you call say: (Some of the ways I thought we might be able to work together are x,y, and z. We can discuss those at a time of your choice.)
2. Study Needs - to head off their impatience keep your queries interesting by alternating asking questions and giving additional information. Do this in a practical manner. They need to view the meeting as purposeful so they want to understand ultimately where your questions lead. When asking them questions it's essential to make them as practical and logical as possible. Aim questions at the heart of the issue and ask them in a straight forward manner. Only request information that is unavailable elsewhere. When gathering information ask questions showing you've done your homework about their desired results and current efforts. Know their industry and company. Be sure to make queries to allow them to talk about their business goals. (Since your leadership has brought your company from 27th to third in the country, what happens now?) Gear your studying to saving them time.

3. Proposing solutions - Your presentation must be geared towards their priorities. They're concerned with saving time, generating money, and making life easier and more efficient. If you gear the presentation to how they can become more successful you'll no doubt get their attention. Zero in on the bottom line with quick benefit statements. Because of their lack of time they don't focus as much interest in contemplating or evaluating ideas. They want you to do the analysis and lay it out for them to approve or disapprove. They like rapid concise analysis of their needs and your solutions. Get into better business relationships with them by being prepared, and demonstrating your competence and show them how your product will help them achieve their goals. Focus on results and highlight important specifics. Cut out intermediate steps when you make your presentation, eliminate the small talk, and stick to business. Professionalism counts with them, during those times when it's appropriate to give historical data about your company or a more detailed presentation write it out before you call. This allows you to highlight key points with a marking pen before you see them. Otherwise you run the risk of boring or irritating them with too much data. Skip over the less important facts and show them the bottom line basics. You can leave them copies of paperwork for them to look over or delegate that task to someone on their team that enjoys that stuff. Be prepared to answer rapid fire questions from them and know the answers immediately. They may need the information now, or just have a desire to challenge you. If you get it to him later if you don't have the answer you can still meet his needs because sometimes they just want to see how you respond.
4. Gaining Commitment - You can come right out and ask whether they're interested. (Based on what we just discussed, are you interested in starting our service, or carrying our product?) They'll often tell you yes or no in no uncertain terms. At times though, they can put you off as if they can't make a decision. When in fact they aren't even thinking about it. They can become so pre-occupied with other business that they literally do not have the time to evaluate your ideas especially if they don't have enough information. When you draw up a commitment letter pay attention to how much time you spend on points they may not care about explain your commitment to attain both their bottom line results and your goals for a mutually acceptable agreement. Consequently the best way to deal with them is to give them options and probable outcomes. Keep in mind that they like to balance quality with cost considerations. So include this information when you want them to make a decision. Then offer options with supporting evidence and leave the final decision to them. (The way I see it, you can go with option a (say pros and cons) option b (say pros and cons) or option c (other pros and cons). I've outlined these 3 plans, cost of implementation and approximate completion dates. Which one sounds best to you?) They seek control so let them make the final decision. Brief and to the point like the D himself, this approach automatically fills their need to have the final word.
5. Assuring their satisfaction - Since they usually don't emphasize a personal relationship in business, if you sell to one don't rely on past sells to ensure future purchases. Follow up with them to see if they have any complaints or problems with your product. If they do, fix them or their impatience will motivate them to seek assistance elsewhere probably with another customer. Impress upon them that you intend to Stand behind your product or service. Also stress that you will follow up without taking a lot of their time. (You're buying this to save effort and time. I want to ensure that it continues to work for you. I'll periodically check back to make sure everything is running smoothly, but I don't want to waste your time with unnecessary calls. When I telephone if everything is fine, just say so and that'll be it. If anything is less than you expect, I want you to call me right away, and I'll see to it that the problem is fixed immediately.)

Strategies: Plan to be prepared, organized, fast paced, and always to the point. Meet them in a professional and businesslike manner. Learn and study their goals and objectives. What they want to accomplish, how they currently are motivated to do things, and what they'd like to change. Suggest solutions with clearly defined and agreed upon consequences as well as rewards that relate specifically to their goals. Get to the point, provide options and let them make the decision when possible. Let them know that you don't intend to waste their time.

Selling to I's

Like the other types apply your active listening skills, but be an especially empathic listener with them. Give positive feedback to let them know you understand and can relate to what their feeling. When you talk about yourself remember to use feeling words instead of thinking words. Share your vision of the world in terms of your emotions, opinions and intuitions. Tell stories about yourself, especially humorous or unusual ones to win the heart and sale of them. Allow them to feel comfortable by also listening to their stories, even to the point of talking about topics that may stray from the subject.

1. Making contact with them - When you write to or personally meet them give the letter or meeting an upbeat friendly feeling faster pace. Don't talk about features specifics or performance data. In your initial benefit statement stress those aspects of your product or service that will give them what they want. Status, recognition excitement, and being the first one on their block to have the newest most dynamic product or service you can offer. The first time you call them use a more open ended friendly approach. Tell them who you are and say something like (I'd like to come by and show you an exciting new product that will organize and analyze your accounts and help you become even more of a top performing sales person) When you meet them, feel in terms of someone running for election. Shake hands firmly introduce yourself with confidence and immediately show interest in them personally. Let them set the pace and direction of the conversation. Since they typically enjoy talking about themselves ask questions about them. How did you get into this business? Prepare for lengthy answers though. Plan to have as many meetings with them as necessary to build the relationship and gather information. After your first visit, you may want to meet for breakfast or lunch. Placing a time limit on those two meals is easier than putting a cap on dinner.
2. Studying Their Needs - They get bored quickly when they're not talking about themselves. That's why so much information gathering needs to revolve around them. But, remember to strike a balance between listening to their life stories and gathering the information you need to be an effective sales consultant. When asking business questions keep them brief. If you can, work these expository questions in with the social questions. (You mention people as one of the keys to your success... How do you find/recruit the people you work with? What kind of training do you give them?) The better your relationship with them the more willing they'll be to cooperate and talk about the task at hand. They can be so open they may tell you their fondest hopes and aspirations. If you can demonstrate how your product or service can get them closer to their dreams they become so excited about your product and you that they're likely to sell themselves to you.

3. Proposing Solutions - Style is as important as substance so sell the sizzle as well as the steak. The presentation should show them how the product or service will increase his prestige image, or recognition. Talk about the favorable impact or consequences your suggestion will have in making their working relationships more enjoyable give them incentives for completing tasks by stressing how their contributions will benefit others and evoke positive responses from them. Presentations need impact for them so involve as many senses as possible. They want both the presentation and the product to feel great. They also want to be reminded of who else has it, but spare them the details of other people's successes. Show them how you can save them effort and still make them look good. Back up your claims with testimonials from well known people or corporations. They respond well to other people's positive experiences with your product or service. So tell them who else uses it. If one of their heroes tries something, they're likely to try it too. Better yet, name some satisfied acquaintances that they know and admire.)They may even respond with - go no further if it's good enough for Fredrich it's good enough for me, he probably spent weeks researching comparing and contrasting. He really knows what he's doing. You should put that guy on your payroll.)
4. Gaining Commitment - Be open and ask, "Where do we go from here?" Or "What's our next step?" If your inventory is low tell them. "I see you're really excited about this, I only have 3 left. Do you want one now?" They are very spontaneous and respond well to the bandwagon approach, everybody's doing it, if they like something they buy it - all other things being equal. You may have to hold them back because they also tend to overbuy. A behavior both you and your customer may live to regret. They don't like paper and details. So they're likely to hesitate and even procrastinate when it comes with taking the time required to create a commitment letter specifying who does what by when. (Do you really think I won't live up to my word?) - While a handshake is usually good enough for them, you'd be wise to have a written understanding. Both of you may hear the same words, but they tend to interpret those words in a positive light, and often to their advantage. For this reason it may help to draw up a summary in advanced and go over it with them. Make absolutely sure that you agree on the specifics or later on you can almost bet on some degree of misunderstanding and disappointment. When they tell you a written agreement isn't necessary simply say you need such a clear summary for your own benefit so as to help yourself and others remember what is expected. Also mention that you appreciate their show of faith in you. You might say something like "I just want to make sure that we're in 100% agreement Mark. I'll feel better about this if I keep a record for us to have if we ever need to refer to it in the future." When you put your concerns in terms of such desired positive feelings how can they object? “Okay if it will make you feel better about it, but I’m already 100% sure.” they may respond. Next, if required change whatever details require changing and the job will be done quickly and painlessly. Finally go ahead and write up this agreement as a means of verification, and send or better yet give them a copy in person. Then you’ll have a much better shot at a more long standing productive business relationship.

5. Assuring their satisfaction - In business as in love they frequently buy before they’re sold. When they jump in too quickly the probability that they’ll suffer buyer’s remorse is higher than the other behavioral types. They need ongoing reminders that they’ve made the right purchase decision because they get bored quickly even with new things. So make sure you re-enforce their decision by giving them plenty of service and/or assistance immediately after the sale. Be certain that they actually do use your service or they may get frustrated from incorrect usage and either put it away never to use it again or return it for a refund. Think of yourself as an organizer for a basically less organized type. To allow them to get the most out of your product. As a bonus for the extra effort remember they tend to talk up or talk down what ever pops into their minds. Since they mingle with so many people you can even ask them if they’d be willing to share with others their glowing testimonials about you and your product/service.

Sales Strategies for I’s - Show that you’re interested in them, let them talk and allow your animation and enthusiasm to emerge. Take the initiative by introducing yourself in a friendly or informal manner and be open to new topics that seem to interest them. Support their dreams and goals. Illustrate your ideas with stories and emotional descriptions that they can relate to their goals or interests. Clearly summarize details and direct these to mutually agreeable objectives and action steps. Provide incentives to encourage quicker decisions. Give them testimonials.

Selling to S’s

They’re concerned with maintaining stability for themselves, so they want to know step by step procedures that are likely to meet their details and logical follow through action. Organize your presentation, list specifics show sequences and provide data. If possible, outline your proposals or materials. Satisfy their need to know the facts. But also illicit their personal feelings and emotions by asking for their input on how to aspects. Listen patiently to them projecting your true interest in them as individuals in their own right. Express your appreciate for their steadiness dependability and cooperative teamwork. Get to know them personally. Flex yourself to be nonthreatening pleasant, friendly, but still professional. Develop trust credibility and friendly at a relatively slow informal pace. Then communicate with them in a consistent manner on as regular basis as is required.

1. Making contact - contact with them is best when soft, pleasant and specific. Include the human element as well as references to things. Mention the name of the person who referred you. “Hello Mr. Newhouse I’m Sheldon with the Pinpoint Acupuncture Clinic. Marry Walsh said you’d appreciate knowing about me and my clinic. Oh, she did call you. Good. If you like I could come by. We could get to know each other, and I can tell you about the ways other people have relieved their allergies using our treatments.” Remember, you may have the best product or service in the world, but if they don’t like you they’ll settle for even second or fourth best from a sales person they like.

2. Studying Them - They can be excellent interviewees talk warmly and informally and ask gentle open questions that draw them out. Especially around more sensitive areas. Show tact and sincerity in probing about their needs. (Mr. Harmon, I noticed you've been here for about 30 years, you must have seen a lot. Hypothetically speaking, how would you go about refining a few of the things that aren't working around here in the information department?) If they do not have a good feeling about your product your company or even you. They will not take the chance of hurting your feelings by telling you so. They want to avoid confrontations. Even minor ones so they may tell you what think you'd like to hear rather than what they really think. This same reticence may also apply to telling you about their dissatisfaction with your competitors. Even though this is exactly what you want to hear... They may think "I know it hasn't been working well, but their such nice people. I don't want to say anything negative about them."

3. Proposing solutions - Show how your product will stabilize, simplify or support their procedures or relationships. Clearly define their roles and goals in your suggestions. And, include specific expectations for them in your plan. Present new ideas or variations from their current routines in a non threatening way. Provide them with the time and opportunities to adjust to changes and operating procedures an relationships. When change becomes necessary tell them why and explain how long the changes will take, and any interim alterations of the current conditions. Design your message to impart a sense of stability and security. (This plan will enable you to continue doing things the same basic way with a few updates here and there, don't worry about the updates because I'll be here to walk you through them each step of the way, and the real benefit in the final analysis is that this refinement will result in more stability than we now have.) Concentrate on security, harmony steadiness, and concrete benefits. This pension plan could help your entire staff, save for your retirement with a minimum amount of worry. Even though social security will be tapped out by the time they retire, they'll be able to depend on this safety net.) Answer their concerns about how and what as much as you can. Reassure them that you'll find out about the information they want to know then do it. Stress that this isn't a big change, just a way to help them do what they already di but better. They like to be shown the appropriate steps to follow, so share those with them. (After you turn the equipment on, push the blue button to activate the equipment, when you hear the motor, begin.) Involve them by asking their oppinions. (Is this an important concern for you, or are you looking for some other specific benefit instead?)

4. Gaining commitment - They are slow deductive decision makers. They listen to the opinions of others and take the time to solicit those opinions before making up their minds. So make a specific action plan. Provide personal guidance, direction, or assurance as required for pursuing the safest most logical course to follow. When you reach agreement try to explore any potential areas of misunderstanding or dissatisfaction. They like guarantees that new actions will provide minimum risk to their desired stable state. So offer assurances of support. Try not to rush them. But do provide gentle helpful nudges to help them to decide when needed. Otherwise they may postpone their decisions. Involve them by personalizing the plan, and showing them how it will directly impact them, and their coworkers. "Our system will identify which employees deserve an immediate raise and at a faster rate than our old method." When asking for a commitment guide them to a choice if they seem indecisive. “We’ve gone over all of the possibilities for improving customer service Seymore I think this option is the best because it will generate most customer interest. Why don’t we go ahead and implement it now?” Another approach is to lead them. Once you’ve determined which action is in their best interest, lead them to the confirmation with your recommendation. “Jean, we’ve talked about a lot of things and I firmly believe that this is the best solution for you. I would not recommend it if I wasn’t 100% convinced it will work for you” When you’ve gained agreement you can gently lead them to the next step. “If you agree with everything we just discussed our next typical step with the customer is to fill out the agreement and begin the process of deposit.” There is nothing pushy or manipulative about this if you’ve studied your prospects needs, and are now recommending a solution that you honestly believe best satisfies their needs. Then it’s a win win situation.

5. Assuring Them - Practice consistent and predictable follow up. Give them your personal guarantee that you will remain in touch. Keep things running smoothly and be available on an as needed basis. They like to think that they have a special relationship with you. That you are more than just another business acquaintance. Remember they dislike oneshot deals so follow up to maintain your relationship. Of all the types they most prefer a continuing predictable relationship. Impersonal computerized follow through is not as appealing to this type so continue building your business relationship with your low keyed attention and offers of assistance. “I’ll call on you once each month to make sure you’re satisfied with our product. If you have any problems or concerns at all just phone me at my office and I’ll get back to you as soon as I can. In fact here’s my home number.”

Sales & Service Strategies for S’s - Get to know them more personally and approach them in a non-threatening pleasant and friendly, but professional way. Develop trust, friendship and credibility at a relatively slow pace. Ask them to identify their own emotional needs as well as their task or business expectations. Get them involved by focusing on the human element. That is, how something affects them and their relationship with others. Avoid rushing them and give them personal concrete assurances when appropriate. Communicate with them in a consistent manner on a regular basis.

Selling To C’s - They are precision people. Efficiency experts who want to do their jobs as they want to do nearly every else, the right way. They also seek confirmation that they’re right, but won’t typically volunteer that need. Going about tasks slowly so they have enough time to check things out, they dislike rushing or being rushed. They operate on a level that prefers thinking words not feeling words to build your credibility by remembers to think with your head not with your emotions. Focus on your understanding about the what’s and why’s of your proposal.

1. Making Contact - Before meeting tell them briefly what you’ll cover so they know what to expect. This can be done when you make the appointment. Show them logical proof from reliable sources that accurately documents your quality, track record, and value. Once you’ve verified your credentials preferably in writing with tangible examples, make copies of a few. You can establish your product’s or services’ credentials too. Speak slowly. Economize on words. Explain why you are contacting them. This type doesn’t care as much about social interaction beyond courtesy and pleasantness, so get to the point. Avoid making small talk and speaking about yourself, except to initially establish your credibility. They tend to be somewhat humble and are naturally suspicious of those who talk themselves up.

2. Studying them - They often like to answer questions that reveal their expertise so they can be very good interviewees. As long as you ask logical fact oriented relevant questions. They tend to enjoy talking to you Phrase your questions to help them give you the right information. “How many pages of completed copy do you typically write per week?” Ask open and closed questions that investigate their knowledge systems objectives and objections. “When do you foresee finishing this project?” Or “What possible problems do you think you might encounter?” Let them show you how much you know. Make your own answers short and crisp. If you don’t know the answer to something, don’t fake it. Tell them you’ll get the answer to them by a certain time, then do it.
3. Proposing solutions - Emphasize logic accuracy, value quality and reliability. Present obvious disadvantages. Make your points and then ask if they want further clarification. They dislike talk that isn’t backed up with both supporting evidence and achievement focused action. Describe the process that you plan to follow, then outline how that process will produce the results they seek. Elicit specific feedback. “So far, what are your reactions? Do you have any reservations that you’d like to clear up?” They probably do so encourage communication. “Specifically, how do you view the practicality of applying this computer program to satisfy your current requirements?” Of all of the types they’re most likely to see the drawbacks so point out the negatives before they do. Such honesty will only enhance your credibility. If you don’t draw attention to the disadvantages this type may view your failure to do so as a cover up. Instead let them assess the relative cost v.s. benefits that are typical trade offs when making realistic choices between available, competing yet imperfect products or services.
4. Gaining Commitment - Provide logical options with documentation. Give them as much opportunity to research beforehand before your meeting. Give them enough time and data to analyze their options before you speak to them. Unlike D’s and I’s this type is uncomfortable with snap decisions. When they say they’ll think about it they’re probably serious. So the key is to allow for as much information gathering before the point where you’re aiming for a commitment. On the other hand when an S says I’ll think about it he may be stalling or may in fact not want your product. The key is to understand the different and know when letting them go and consider their options after the pitch will actually generate your sale as opposed to an objection. Unless C’s have already researched the field and determined yours is the best, they probably have your competitors calling upon them. Know your competition so you can point out your advantages relative to what they offer. This type is most likely to do their own comparative shopping, so mention your company’s strengths as you suggest questions they may want to ask your competitors. “Ask them if they have an unconditional money back guarantee. Or, how long have you been in business. Or, will they also train new employees at no additional cost?” In short point out the things your company does as well or better than your competition. If they are absolutely adamant about talk to the competitors to gather all of their information withhold a bit of information and get a commitment from them to speak to you again to finalize things after they’ve talked to the competitors to leverage their personality type against your competitors and ensure you’re the last person that they Speak with. Do this in a factual professional way that is based on allowing them to do a comparative cost benefit analysis of the options.

5. Assuring Customer Satisfaction - Set a specific timetable for when you'll measure success. Continue proving your reliability quality and value. Make yourself available for follow up on customer satisfaction. "Mr. Quemby, I'll check back with you on Tuesday morning if that's alright. To make sure that your new phone system is functioning correctly. Here's my card with the numbers to my office, home and an emergency 24 hotline if you experience any problems."

Sales & Service Strategies for C's - Have as much information about your company available online for them to easily access to do their due diligence before you speak to them. Prepare so that you can answer as many of their questions as soon as possible, Greet them cordially, but proceed quickly to the task, don't start with personal or social talk. Hone your skills in practicality and logic, ask questions and reveal a clear direction and that fit into the overall scheme of things. Document how and why something applies, be comfortable with giving them time to think, learn how to distinguish between their genuine need for time to think v.s. someone using it as an excuse to ghost you. When pushing them make sure to address their resistance to the idea of rushed and hasty decisions, if you can't put pressure on them while maintaining your rapport they'll either respond with withdrawal or stubbornness. Tell them both the pros and cons and the complete story, Follow through and deliver what you promised.